There are a lot of answers to this question, but none of them leverage a Cryptographically Secure Pseudo-Random Number Generator (CSPRNG).. The simple, secure, and correct answer is to use RandomLib and don't reinvent the wheel.. For those of you who insist on inventing your own solution, PHP 7.0.0 will provide random_int() for this purpose; if you're still on PHP 5.x, we wrote a PHP 5

Use the `.c_str()` method for `const char *`. You can use `&mystring[0]` to get a `char *` pointer, but there are a couple of gotcha's: you won't necessarily get a zero terminated string, and you won't be able to change the string's size. You especially have to be careful not to add characters past the end of the string or you'll get a buffer overrun (and probable crash).

I remember watching the film when I was in my 2nd or 3rd year high school for a movie review. I barely remember what happened and decided to finally pick the book as it sits on my shelf for more than 3 years. I didn't expect to like it because historical fiction isn't my usual kind of read and I find it refreshing. The premise of this book is
